Hello guys, It's me again. Today, we will create a simple Blackjack game in Unity to learn the basics about Unity3D. If you don't know what's Blackjack, well, a quick description is that the game is about two players, who bets in different numbers of chips in an attempt to beat the other player. In each round, depending on the result you got in the last round, you will get a different amount of chips. In the following tutorial, we will create a simple blackjack game with Unity3D. So let's get started. In the first step, I create a simple scene with an empty scene, the blackjack table, two player objects with the standard blackjack things. It's also the same as what we created in part one of my Unity tutorial series. Now let's create an input manager. In this example, we do not need any input, so for simplicity, let's set the InputEnabled to false. Next, let's create the logic of the game. We will use a public float called leftHand, which will be the number of chips in the players hand, and a public float called rightHand, which will be the amount of chips that the player is betting. The logic of the game is very simple. The player can only bet between zero and the amount of chips that the player has in his or her hands. If the player bets higher than that, then the chips are subtracted from his or her hand and the amount of chips that the player has is decreased by that amount. The same thing is done to the other player
