How Will a Data Breach Hurt Retailers' Balance Sheets? The data breach at Home Depot is under investigation, and the retailer has not provided details on how long it will take to discover how many customers have been affected. But if it turns out Home Depot is dealing with a large number of individual victims, it could put a significant dent in its revenue and profit margins. Home Depot's troubles are a reminder that, when it comes to data security, the biggest threat isn't hackers or a malicious employee with a gun. The biggest threat comes from consumers who aren't taking the necessary precautions to protect their private information, says Dan Castro, partner and chief data security officer at consulting firm ForeScout. "The problems that come from consumers carelessly sharing their data are much greater and more common than data breaches caused by the people who steal that data," he says. Data breaches are one of the biggest threats to the retailer's bottom line. "Data breaches are not just a legal risk, but a financial risk," says Chris Kane, a partner in the privacy and information security practice at law firm Dorsey & Whitney. The Home Depot breach could also have implications for its vendors and contractors. "The contractor community — electrical, plumbing, etc. — have access to the information that Home Depot has shared, and we're going to want to be in a position to say what kind of access they had, whether it was appropriate and what we can do about the breach," Kane says. There's also the risk of personal identification information being used to commit identity theft or other fraud. "I can imagine if there were hundreds of
