Precision and accuracy of computer-based versus automatic motion analysis systems during bench press exercise. The precision and accuracy of the computer-based motion analysis (CAS) and automatic motion analysis (AMA) systems were investigated in ten adults during repeated and consecutive bench presses using a robotic (Rob2) and a magnetic (Acu) load cell. The mean-standard error of the two systems was not significantly different for the power (P) and mean power (MP) variables. The variability indexes of the P and MP were significantly lower in the AMA system. The MP/power ratio was the lowest with the AMA system, while the RMS of the P and MP variables were the highest with CAS in the same exercise. The percentage of overestimation of the CAS variables over AMA variables was higher for the flexion-extension of the elbow (31.3-43.5%) and lower for the abduction-adduction of the shoulder (1.1-2.2%) and the flexion-extension of the wrist (2.8-3.9%). The precision of the two systems is thus comparable during bench press exercise, but CAS seems to be less accurate in measuring the P and MP variables. This study focused on the precision and accuracy of two motion analysis systems during bench press exercise. To the best of our knowledge, this is the first direct comparison between the CAS and AMA systems. The study allowed to conclude that the motion analysis of bench press exercise is feasible and that both the CAS and AMA systems seem to be reliable to analyse power and mean power. The measurement errors were however not negligible, especially for low power forces (i.e. short forces) and P and MP variability indexes. Motion analysis could therefore be a powerful tool to determine the most accurate bench press position during a training session.Q: Get the "other" value in a percent column I have the following query to return a user with their requested discount: $user = $this->db ->select('id,name') ->from('users') ->join('users_services', 'users.id = users_services.user_id') ->join('services', 'users_services.service_id = services.id') ->where('users_services.discount

A fast, nonlinear least-square optimal ensemble Kalman filter with an adaptive phase-damping model is proposed to estimate instantaneous QT intervals from single-lead ECG recordings. The method is compared with standard deviations of adjacent R-R and QT intervals using a database of 589 ECG segments. In contrast to existing methods, the method accurately detects all manually selected episodes of ventricular fibrillation (VF). Even for short VF episodes (20-30 s in duration), the method detects the absence of clinical VF with nearly 100% accuracy. For VF episodes of up to 60 s duration, the method accurately detects the onset of VF, albeit at a reduced sensitivity. Thus, the method may be used for automatic detection of arrhythmias.SK-Kiew, September 24, 2017. /TACC /.
