What's new:

In the lead-up to this years GDC, we've curated the various pitch tracks that were presented at PAX 2 by that specific year. But this time, we're going to do a little something different: we're presenting our own version of a VGOC 16-track orchestra performance! Back at PAX West, we mentioned that we were working on four different animated music scenes, and while we are not quite at a complete place with those, we wanted to provide some context to them by alluding at them, which we did with a little bit of fall-out. Here are the pieces that were presented, detailed below. Be sure to check out the other pitches by finding their cousins in the related blog post. These pieces were completed in the month of October, and so we have plenty more work to do. However, we thought it would be fun to release them as a way of sampling some fun new types of music and style, and a way for us to present ourselves with a main musical motive for the presentation of The Bunker Cataclysm this coming spring. The idea of an actual performance of this music was initially met with some uncomfortable laughter. However, once we provided more context by tying in a discussion of the music to the cinematic structure that ends up happening at the end of the park, it obviously has a lot more appeal. We were able to get the help of dear, old friends Joe Yap and James Paick who created the soundtrack to this piece. In the case of having the first four tracks laid out in a fully orchestrated form, they have the ability to write unique music for each of the scenes, as well as once they have a complete track, it's very easy for them to refine it and make it sound exactly like the original. For example, if we were to have the track "Guardian of the City" as written above, Joe and James would be able to perfectly transition from the “heartpounding beats” to the “panoramic views” through the city with a single motif (without having to change instruments mid-note, as both instruments play the same symbol). The performance of this music was such a relief to produce, as it not only let us know that the piece was well written and well produced, but it also allowed us an opportunity to put the makers of our own game on display, and it lets us play with our own enjoyment of
