Electronic Cash Rules Figure 1. Japanese 15 yen coin Figure 1. Japanese 15 yen coin This new coin, known as the "e- yen" or "e-jiko" coin, is expected to be widely circulated within the next six months. It is related to a set of fundamental rules for electronic (or, as the physical coins are called in Japan, electronic) cash that will be implemented on March 1. The first is that there will be only a fixed amount of e- money. The objective is to manage the quantity in circulation and prevent counterfeits from appearing on the market. There are two types of cash, or to be precise, one. One version is stored in small, prepaid e- money cards that can be bought from small stores. The other is "hot" e- cash, which is stored in mobile phones and is linked to a specific account. The conversion between the two is made by the Bank of Japan. The other requirement is that electronic money cannot be transferred, as is the case with the current cash. Once e-money is used, it goes to the holder, who will be able to spend it for a fixed fee. The minimum sum will be four thousand yen (about $33). On top of that, it will cost 10% more to withdraw the money. Figure 2. Japanese 10,000 yen banknote Figure 2. Japanese 10,000 yen banknote The same banknote as the previous one, but this one is e- money. It is very similar to the paper bills in the country, and is a powerful symbol of the future in the same way paper bills represent the past. Figure 3. Japanese 20,000 yen banknote Figure 3. Japanese 20,000 yen banknote The digital money will be linked to the mobile phone number of the user and will be stored in the chip of the device. To withdraw it, the user will be required to enter a four-digit code that only he knows. Will Japan change its lifestyle to embrace the digital era? Figure 4. The first Japanese e- coin Figure 4.
