30.08.2018 10:45 Right, thanks. Used for SSDs, check this out: Not open-source, but has a reasonably good reputation. The latest model I got, the 950 Pro, has an open-source tuning utility from Samsung. So you can test your drive while overclocking it. A: I've had a similar problem and even though I had 16GB of RAM my system wouldn't actually use it all; I've learnt a lot about caching and mem etc from your answer. The way to be best guess is to be using a disk cache (I use Windows 7 and it's called Disk Cache, IIRC it's a partition on the system drive) for your data. Open the Control Panel and then go to the Disk Management and look at the partitions of your harddisk. From there, right click on the partition for cache and right click on "Format" (unless it says it's an operating system) and select "create" or "resize". Then on the available partitions, select "Allocated" and hit continue. I'd try doing the same, if the cache has not enough space, but resize to get rid of the problematic one if you can't resize it properly. Hope that helps. After starting the season in the No. 16 position, NASCAR Xfinity Series point leader A.J. Allmendinger will begin the final day of the fall tour with a tie for the lead, following three consecutive top-five finishes. Both Larson and Truex lead the Whelen Modified Tour (WMT) standings with five wins each. Larson made his season debut at the famed New Jersey State Fairgrounds on Sunday, September 24, when he and his TRG Motorsports teammate Ed Berrier started out of the No. 7 spot and passed the field en route to a first-time victory. On October 22, the two teams will be joined by the Glenview, Ill., team of Kyle Busch, the No. 18 Sprint Car of the Year, and his HScott Motorsports teammate Berrier. Larson and Busch will drive the No. 18 and No. 48 TRG-owned Mobil 1 Chevrolet Camaros. “It’s going to be a lot of fun racing,” said Larson. “I don’t think it will be too much different, but it’s a track that Kyle and I like. It’s one of the last races
