What's new:

Kittycat is a small island in the Caribbean Sea lying off the northeastern coast of Haiti, approximately 25 km west of Marigot, 80 km east of Cape Cayay and 156 km east of Port-au-Prince. Founded in 1621, the island is governed as a district of the North Department of Haiti, and has a small population. It is noted for being the birthplace of former President of Haiti Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 1939, although his parents were already living on the island at that time. Geography Cape Cat, the main town on the island, is a small provincial capital and trading port near to the mouth of the Kirk Quays River that is located at the northern end of the western shore of the island. It is in the National Park of the Côte du Nord, Haiti, near to the village of Tote. Kirk Quay On February 2, 1860, slave revolts broke out in plantations throughout the island, and the slave uprising and resulting counter-revolutionary repression are remembered as one of the most important slave protests in all of the New World and the most successful slave uprising in the West Indies. During the disturbances, the slaves opened up the river from Cape Cat to the west of the island to create a sluiceway around the island. The recently formed Kirk Quay provided an effective blockade against any invading forces and ensured that the slave-owning sugar planters could not penetrate the slaves' territories and regain control of the plantations. As many as thirty thousand slaves were killed in the revolt and repression, according to some historians, and the Kirk Quays is widely considered to be a hellish-like place, dotted with unmarked burials of the dead, even today. Even though the slaves of Cap Cat were largely successful in expelling their French and colonial masters and invading the island, their success would be short-lived. The difficulty of establishing a successful colony in a waterlogged area that is located between an ocean and a land is that a large part of the Colonato Power Plant that was established with the help of Cuba in 1894 is located on the bank of the River, and power from the plant has protected the cost of live, health, and housing on the island in the early period of the occupation. Without the Cap Cat power plant, the Cap Cat administration had existed until 1991. Residents of the Kirk Quay are still hoping that Haiti will give them back the power
