How do you get some open time nowadays? For most of us, it's probably found sitting at a computer in front of the television, surfing the net, or watching Netflix (yes, I've actually done that, so I know something about it). So, it makes sense that if you can make it easier to work on and share images with the iPad Pro, you don't have to spend the time working on the computer. It must be this deterrent that holds a lot of professionals back from jumping on the iPad Pro bandwagon. Not having easy access to all the apps and features we are accustomed to from the desktop inevitably holds a lot of people back. Right now, this is a pivotal moment for this new tablet. To many, it's not entirely the tool it might be, it's the iPad Pro's ability to do other things within the tool that will make or break its usefulness. Apple needs to make some mind-blowing improvements to Photoshop Sketch and its ecosystem if it wants to attract more creative professionals to using it. That's the key to it's success.
