Yes, this is 2012, but this shouldn't be surprising, as a toddler can legally buy an album these days. Still, there's no way a 12-year-old is spending $11 on an album, so what does that make it? Continue Reading Below Advertisement The answer is "up to $25." Also the answer is "yes, definitely." Also that is obviously why YG and 9th Wonder were able to get rich. Get some context here, guys: YG is a rapper from Houston, like every other rapper you've heard of. And 9th Wonder, his partner in crime, is a producer with a history of making tracks that sound like science experiments gone horribly wrong. The songs themselves are not terribly interesting. It's unclear how this very young child would know about any of these people. So I guess they're better known than we thought. Continue Reading Below Advertisement When we say that a toddler has the ability to spend $25 on an album, we mean the parents are okay with that. There are hundreds of albums where the parents have to spend more than $25, because the child does not have the ability to buy them. As with any product, there are different prices for different sets of people. Thank God! Sometimes the parents are young themselves, and they're willing to spend the money. But even then, it's not like the toddlers are making the album. It's just what the adults find to listen to.

We, as a society, are generally okay with that. We don't want them to listen to the latest best-selling Meatwad or Chumbawamba album, but we are not OK with that kid buying the $25 album. That's why they get the iTunes Gift Cards for Christmas. At least that way the parents can say, "No, you didn't buy that on your own." Continue Reading Below Advertisement You don't see that all too often, because there's some weird regulation that children can't buy anything over $15. But when you put
