Thus the final evolution in sharing is with heightened awareness of security. The average Social Networker has become a file repository, which has made the product a safe repository as well. The Macintosh files are encrypted and remain on the hard drive, and only the user can access the file from the application. With the update you can never lose, shift, or accidentally delete your file. Basically you just load up your PSD file into a copy of Photoshop (so it is stored on a local drive) and test your work both on the web and in the iPad and iPhone apps. Essentially, the application is designed to make it easier to share, collaborate, and comment on digital files. Share for Review works seamlessly with the other Collaborative Layer features, Share for Review and Version History. This is a feature we're very excited about, because we know our customers will love it. Nobody likes to get a document from someone else checked in into their version control system, or hear the exchange, "I've seen this color already." Adobe's dedicated team of system administrators has been proven again in this release. They have refined the file locking settings before the addition of the new Collaborative Document. Each new version of Photoshop immediately locks groups of features and layers as you go offline, and no other designers are allowed to edit the same file. The application puts the control in your hands – you choose which pieces of the file can be unlocked for editing by another person. With the new improvements in sharing, we feel the web-hosted Photoshop apps are as good a choice as they have ever been. For designers who are use to testing their designs on a variety of devices, mobile applications for Photoshop are a hit with creatives who are truly after the best of the best. The designers and their clients appreciate being able to get a quick quote, explore design options, and make final approvals and notes without needing to leave the app.
