In a sign of the depth of feelings about freeing up as much work as possible on the computer, Photoshop for the first time has a tool called Content-Aware Fill for removing unwanted objects, such as tattoos, in images. In a demonstration at Adobe MAX, a tattoo removed from a face and replaced with what was once a typical hoodie, and a tiger cub replaced with a full-size tiger. The technology can be used to address similar situations, such as removing someone's hat or wheelchair. Another significant change to Photoshop across the board is Active Selection, which will occur in every type of selection tool, including the ones for groups, graphics, selections, paths, and text. In Photoshop, a handwritten text selection or outline of a group will include the text's existing formatting adjustments when you manipulate it. To simplify your workflow, Photoshop now automatically understands the context of a selection when you're using one tool against another tool. For example, an arrow in one tool will select the line it is on when it overlaps an interior shape in another tool. In other scenarios, such as cloning or deleting a section of the image, you'll find that the features of the content you're working with are automatically detected. This means there are fewer clicks and less activity on your part. Further simplifying Photoshop for the Web and for Mac, Photoshop Working Copy gains six application-specific tabs in a context-sensitive manner. Typically, these configurations are saved in the Library & searches folder, and if your work is saved in other locations, the most recent changes will be available to you. Additionally, Photoshop Workspace gains options such as text and file & locking features, larger size and lower resolution viewing, and the ability to see multiple sizes of an image at once.
